JACOB MOTTE, Public-Treasurer.

The Poertrait of a good Senator.

A Good ſenator will ever carefully attend the ſervice of the public in the houſe, becauſe he knows that the perſon who is choſen, and does not attend, deſerts his poſt, and is almoſt as diſhonourable as he who abſents himſelf out of the hope or fear of obliging or diſobliging a miniſter. He never is neutral; being ſenſible that a perſon, who in ſuch a truſt obſerves a shameful neutrality, is a ſoldier, who hides himſelf in the day of battle. He attends them continually, and is always upon his guard, ne quid detrimenti reſpublica caperet. He is upon no occaſion to be awed by the frowns, or encouraged by the ſmiles of a miniſter. He never gives any vote towards the paſſing of any law, or reſolution, which he does not in his conſcience believe to be for the benefit of his country. He is never ſeduced by falſe colours or pretended friendſhips, or ſophiſtical reaſoning, or the terrors of a majority, to ſwerve once from what he conceives to be true and juſt. He ſpeaks impartially, boldly and perſpicuouſly, not regarding what may pleaſe or diſpleaſe, or what ſhall be approved or diſapproved by any particular party, neither obſtinately cloſing his underſtanding to conviction, nor ſuffering others to blind it. He ſcorns as much to wear the livery of another man's underſtanding, as to take his wages for his vote. He is particularly careful to live within the current income of his own fortune, without which it will be very difficult to preſerve his honour. He knows that the man who is independent, is honeſt. He gives his vote chearfully, and with courage; while he ſtands erect, in the integrity of his ſoul, and the uprightneſs of his reaſoning, he looks over a crowd of ſtarelings. He has a generous and an honeſt warmth within him, which lifts him above the great vulgar. He enjoys the public applauſe of all honeſt men, and is ſecretly admired even by the briber and bribed.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 8.

TUESDAY morning, about four o'clock, a ſhock of an earthquake happened at Oxford. It was perceptibly felt by moſt inhabitants of that city, many of whom aroſe from their beds in great conſternation. In ſome houſes the pewter, &c. was ſhook from the ſhelves.

The courts of France and Spain ſeem at preſent to have their hands full with the depradations of the Sallee and other Barbary rovers, who have now ſo many ſhips of force at ſea, that the commerce of the Mediterranean is become exceedingly precarious.

NOVEMBER 13.

As the Turks have not, and it is believed will not acknowledge the new king of Poland, a war in the eaſt of Europe is feared, and it is not unlikely but that in a little while it will extend to the weſt; for the French (who are at the bottom of this, and whoſe politicks are in eternal agitation) will ſoon find out means to embroil other powers.

WHITEHALL, NOVEMBER 24.

They write from Plymouth, that laſt Thurſday a paſſenger, the maſter, and all the men, belonging to a French bark from Havre de Grace for Corke, were ſtopped by order, and all ſeparately ſearched and examined, on ſuſpicion of their having ſome ill deſign to execute at that port, but the event is not yet known. A letter from Portſmouth ſays, that very ſtrict guard is kept at the dock yard there, and centinels are placed in every part of it at 100 yards diſtance from each other. Extract of a letter from Chatham, November 28.

"We have been greatly alarmed here for theſe ten days paſt, on account of the extraordinary vigilance of all the officers in their ſeveral departments; and we hear the ſame ſtrict attention is paid to the yards at Portſmouth and Plymouth. We are now informed, that this neceſſary caution has been taken, on account of ſome undoubted intelligence that ſome evil deſign was meditating, to be executed in the dark nights, particularly here and the two above-mentioned places; and if ſucceſs attended their plan, it would render it impoſſible for us to have a reſpectable navy for ſome years. If this is true, and every thing here confirms it, it ſhews what confidence is to be put in the profeſſions of ſincere friendſhip and good faith of our late enemies, and their good intentions of preſerving the peace we have ſo lately given them."
